Broad Street Brief: City Hall Prepares for New Mayor, Council Leadership

City Hall

City Council Passes Ski Mask Ban

Today, Philadelphia City Council passed a ban on the wearing of ski masks in certain public spaces in an attempt to improve public safety by a 13-2 vote. The Council is also in the midst of mid-year budget transfer negotiations.

How Councilmember Johnson Became Presumptive Council President

District 2 Councilmember Kenyatta Johnson is all but certain to become the next Council President after 11 current and four future City Council members met last week for an unofficial “straw poll.” While the actual election won’t happen until January, Council’s top Democrats began vying for the prestigious position after current Council President Darrell Clarke announced his retirement last spring, and Councilmember Johnson gained momentum in the fall.

What Mayor-Elect Parker’s PPD Commissioner Selection Process Tells Us About Her Leadership Style

Mayor-elect Chelle Parker announced West Philadelphia native and Chief of School Safety Kevin Bethel as her pick to lead the Philadelphia Police Department (PPD) shortly before Thanksgiving. Many believe the months-long vetting process by which she and her team selected the new PPD commissioner may be indicative of how she will lead when inaugurated.

OIT Reveals New, Parker Administration-Aligned Strategic Plan, Priorities

The City of Philadelphia’s Office of Innovation and Technology (OIT) released its strategic plan for the upcoming year, which intentionally centers five of Mayor-elect Parker’s stated priorities for the office: security and data protection, digital equity and resident services, modernization and efficiency, foundational infrastructure and processes, and technology community partnerships and communication.
