

Judge Rejects Saudi Arabia's Attempt to Toss 9/11 Lawsuits

Thursday, March 29, 2018

A judge recently rejected Saudi Arabia's motion to end a New York lawsuit seeking to hold it responsible in the Sept. 11 attacks. U.S. District Judge George Daniels said the plaintiffs' allegations met the requirements for the court to assume jurisdiction under the Justice Against Sponsors of Terrorism Act. Hundreds of victims' relatives and injured survivors, along with injured corporations, sued the Saudi government in 2003, saying its employees knowingly assisted hijackers who carried out the attacks and fueled al-Qaida's development into a terrorist organization by funding charities that supported the group. "This is really a historic day for the families," said Sean Carter, a member of Cozen O'Connor and an attorney for the plaintiffs. "The families have been trying for many years to have an opportunity for the Saudi government to answer on the merits."
